The doctor's verdict is final: David has cancer. There is still a possibility of remission, but it is very small. And, if the tumor kills him, David won't have a chance to see his baby granddaughter Louise grow up — Louise, who has just been born to David's daughter Miriam, a former war photographer who no longer wants to immortalize anything except that which is beautiful. David will no longer be able to dance with Paula, his wife. Paula, in turn, is letting herself be progressively consumed by the looming shadow of death. And David will not be able to take his younger daughter Tamar to visit the lakes, as they have done every summer. Tamar is only 9 years old, and she has been constructing all sorts of plans that will permit her papa to return to the lakes - so that he won't have to sail off on the final voyage all by himself...

Je ne dirai plus jamais

Je ne dirai plus jamais: «Tout se termine», mais, «Souris et commençons, mon âme.»

En de nouvelles mains je mets de nouvelles rames et de nouvelles tours surgissent de la ruine.

MIRIAM

*Ya nunca más diré: «Todo termina», sino: «Sonríe, alma, y comencemos.»
En nuevas manos pongo nuevos temas
y nuevas torres se alzan de la ruina.*
