In the pages of the legendary Pilote magazine, René Pétillon created the detective Jack Palmer in 1974, a prototype of the goofy antihero, dazed and disastrous. Pétillon, a brilliant observer of society, uses his talent to dissect the morals of his contemporaries. Taking as models the themes of his previous works, namely Corsica and fundamentalism, today the author attacks tax havens and money laundering.

The story, impossible to truly summarize given the numerous savoury plot twists, starts at the doorstep of a bank in a small tax haven tucked into the heart of the Alps. Jack Palmer takes a photo of a man who enters the financial establishment. It's a husband in the middle of divorce proceedings. The lawyer of the wife has charged the detective to bring in proof that he is concealing revenue. The problem is that the photo also shows a notorious member of the Mafia working for the Colombians, come to deposit a suitcase of bills. Palmer is therefore pursued by the Colombians, by the Russian Mafia, and by the local police force, who don't like that someone's prying into their bank's confidentiality, especially now that the G20 is interested. We also meet crazy traders, a principled choir master, and many other eclectic characters. To top it off the whole thing takes place during the Prince's engagement which recalls the glory of Monaco.
