“What if I told you that you could change your life? What would you most want? To get a better job? To find the love of your life? To recover from an incurable disease? Anything is possible! All you have to do is visit one of Paris’s commodity stores and discover the magical object that will grant you a happy future. What are you waiting for?”

Leo has just returned to the city after many years’ absence. He has inherited one of these commodity stores (a barge on the River Seine) from his uncle, who, according to the police, committed suicide.

Suicide? Really? That isn’t what Leo is told by the little cat girl who found his uncle in his cabin. Nor what he learns from the person who is sent to value the barge. Leo must make his own investigation. And for that, he must confront his past. The question is: Should he also use one of his own magical objects to find out what he needs to know?
