This is a personal, intimate vision of a Western story; nothing like Durango or Blueberry. Jean Dufaux returns to the themes that interest him most: the right to be different; the myths and legends of the West; the question of the place of women in a world of men. In this world, Whites and Indians will also have to get along. It's a simple tale, rich in emotions and humanity: a sort of cross between Roman Polanski's Willie Boyle and Don Medford's The Hunting Party.
