In the flat, lifeless landscape of a stony desert stands a correctional boarding school. For seven years, Margot has perfected her solitude there. Transparent and stoic, she watches as Dan and his gang make the rules in yard and corridor, Solweig fistfights out behind the buildings, and the director's daughter naps wherever there's a sunny spot. All these young women are in their last year of high school, and just as freedom rears its head on the bright horizon of seventeen, the "PHENOMENON" happens.

Everyone knows it's rare to survive one. So when the evacuation signal sounds and clouds gather, the girls must run. For just a few minutes later, the tiny murderous creatures will start falling. Everyone still on the premises when the alarm ends will be trapped with these mysterious creatures and left to their fate.

As the clouds roil over the school, students and teachers alike rush through the gates for the safety of the desert. But lost in the labyrinthine halls of an abandoned wing, Margot stops running and faces the inevitable: it's too late for her to escape.
